Amazon's Bezos to step down

CEO says he plans to remain with massive company he founded as executive chairman

By Karen Weise
The New York Times

When Jeff Bezos founded an online bookseller named Amazon in 1994, he said the question that he was asked most frequently was, "What's the internet?" Bezos answered by building

Amazon into a $1.7 trillion behemoth that sold so many different items online it became known as "the everything store." In the process, he upended the retail industry, turned Amazon into a logistics giant and expanded into cloud computing, streaming entertainment and artificial intelligence-powered devices. For a time, he was the world's richest person.

Tuesday, Bezos, 57, said his run at the top of the Seattle-based company was over.

As Amazon reported its latest set of blockbuster financial results, Bezos said he planned to hand over the reins this summer and transition into the role of executive chairman. Andy Jassy, 53, CEO of Amazon's cloud computing division, will be promoted to run the company. The change will be effective in the third quarter, which starts in July.

"As much as I still tap dance into the office, I'm excited about this transition," Bezos said in an email to Amazon's employees. As executive chairman, he said, he intends "to focus my energies and attention on new products and early initiatives."

The changing of the guard is set to ripple out beyond Amazon, which Bezos has personified for more than two decades. His impact on corporate America and his remaking of the way that goods are sold turned him into one of the world's most influential technology and business leaders. BEZOS » PAGE 4

A worker stacks potatoes at a grocery store Tuesday. The Los Angeles City Council voted unanimously to draw up an ordinance requiring hazard pay of an additional $5 per hour for workers at major grocery and drug retail stores in the city.

New measure: If City Council OKs ordinance, it would join Long Beach in increasing employee wages

The day after Kroger said it would shut down two markets in Long Beach in response to a similar measure, Los Angeles leaders voted Tuesday to begin the process for mandating $5 per hour hazard pay for many grocery workers in the city, with several members arguing that such workers have taken on the brunt of the risks as front-line workers during the coronavirus pandemic.

While still concerned about the sluggish coronavirus vaccine supply, Los Angeles County public health officials are touting their ability to get nearly 80% of the roughly 1 million doses received so far into the arms of residents, first to health care workers and long-term care residents and now those 65 and older.

"Although our doses are limited, we have immunized so many among the most vulnerable in our communities," said Board of Supervisors Chair Hilda Solis, who later called the figures VACCINES » PAGE 5

Union agrees to hold off on two raises

Move would quash city's proposal to lay off officers, pay $70M for overtime

The union representing nearly 10,000 rank-and-file Los Angeles police officers has agreed to defer two raises in a deal that will protect sworn officers from layoffs this year, Mayor Eric Garcetti announced Tuesday.

The tentative agreement calls for no layoffs of Los Angeles Police Department employees in this fiscal year, which ends at the end of June, and provides for at least $70 million of cash overtime for each of the three fiscal years after this one.

City leaders had been contemplating laying off 355 LAPD employees as part of a plan to bridge an anticipated $675 million revenue shortfall this year that had been brought on by the coronavirus pandemic.

On Feb. 3, 2020, Ken Meng held one of the first news conferences locally to raise awareness of the coronavirus threat and promote efforts to prevent its spread.

In an email to county and state officials, community members and the media, the Chinese American leader and activist living in Rowland Heights wrote in English and Mandarin: "Disasters know no borders."

Though few people came to his mobile home park clubhouse that day, Meng was not deterred. He sent posts to over 100,000 people across the United States on MENG » PAGE 4
